Dear Dr. Fogel,

Thursday morning
April 17, 1952

To be sure, I want to thank you for the fine time you provided for me when you came to New York. That includes the spiritual experience as well as dinner and lunch, the movie, and the flowers for Mrs. Fosdick. There may be a tendency to forget the material side in the distant future, but never the inspiration provided by the experience.

Yesterday, I was with the Fosdicks again. It was the first time since our meeting with them that I could be with them long enough to talk. — and we certainly did. I got there at three-thirty in the afternoon, and they got rid of me at eleven-thirty. Time certainly can be a nasty thing. I was so engrossed in conversation I almost forgot the dinner we had at their favorite Russian restaurant on fifty-seventh street. You can see we certainly had a great time together, and there are many more in sight.

The House of Fulfilment is by L. Adams Beck. That is the book I was reading when you were here but could not remember the author. I have finished it now and am reading two books Mrs. Foadick gave to me to read. They are both excellent. One is "Perelandra", by C. S. Lewis. The other is "Foundations of Buddhism", by Natalie Pokotoff. I'm deeply interested.

Sincerely,
Vernon Pulling
